

Rajkumar Eligedi

Translation and women's language

Translation is not merely an act of transferring information, but a process of knowledge production. The study of translation and interpretation is not only concerned with the broad questions of universal or specific textual practices. It is also concerned with the daily work of transferring information, opinion, cultural developments, and political policies from one language into many other. This paper raises the questions and discusses the issues concerned with Translation Studies and the question of women's Language as an alternative to the existing patriarchal Languages. It focuses on how conventional "patriarchal" language played an important role in establishing patriarchy. It Problematizes the Links and Interlinks between Translation and women's Language and also talks about the inter-connections amongst women's writing, Feminist writing, and Feminist Translation Studies.